General Network Design

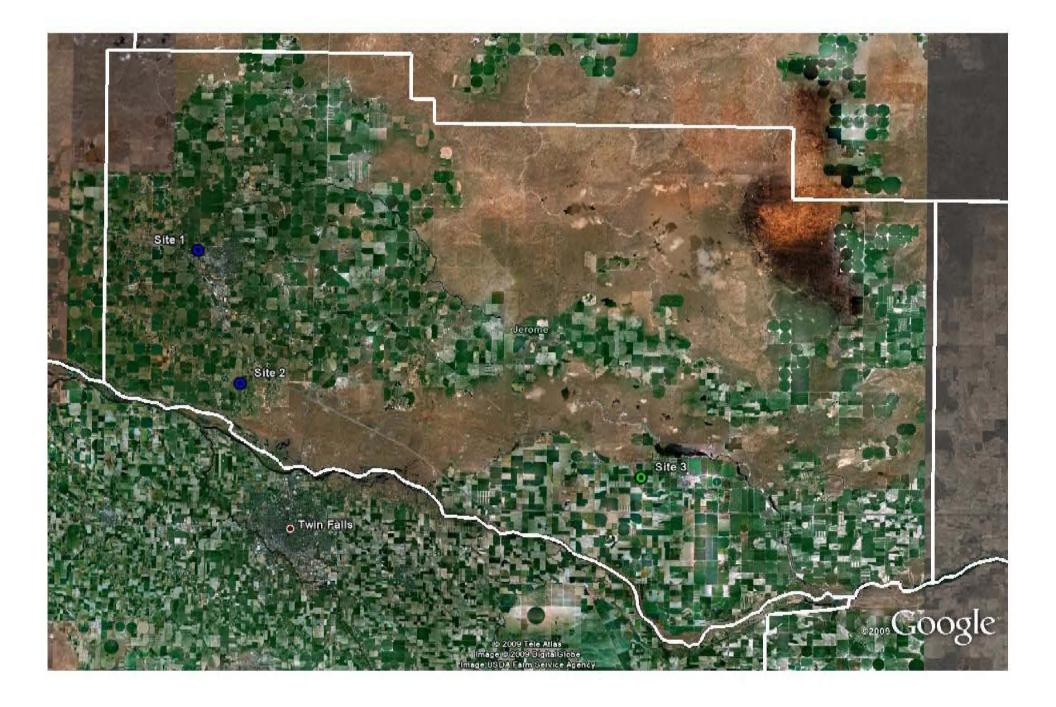

This diagram shows the general design of a DigitalBridge WiMAX network. The following pages specifically show the network design for this application, including the proposed tower locations, microwave links, fiber connections, and aggregation points. The following pages also include a listing of what medium is used to transmit data (fiber or microwave) and the mileages calculated for each transmission path.

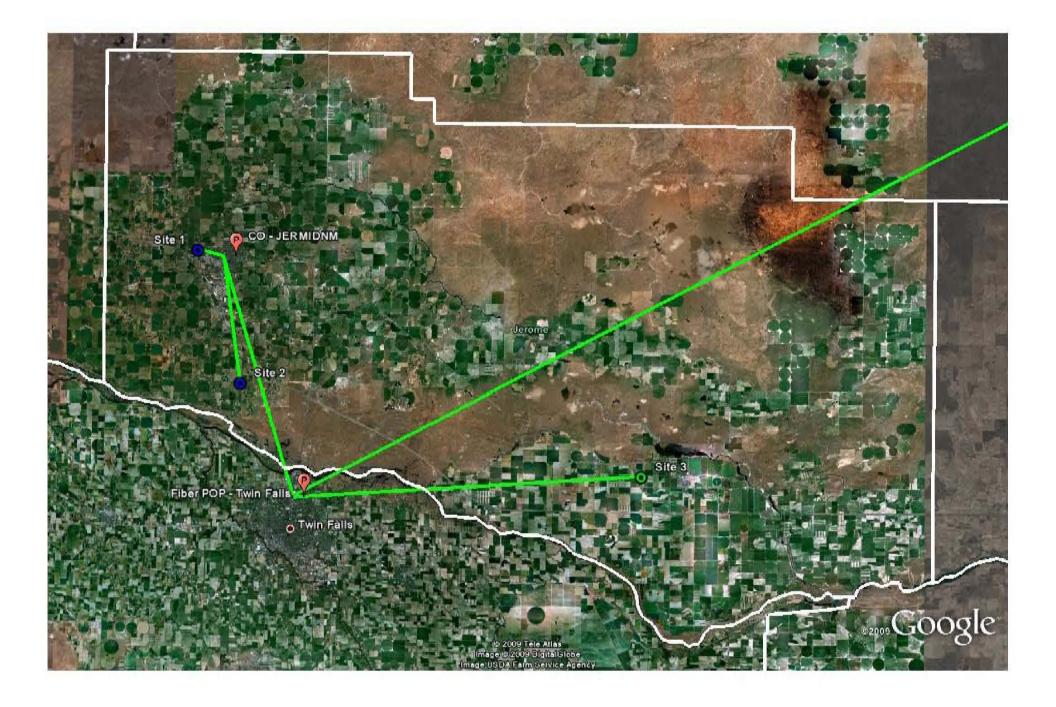

All fiber connections shown on this and all subsequent diagrams are all TCP/IP, either FastEthernet or OC3, with a capacity greater than 100Mbps. All microwave connections shown are TCP/IP Ethernet, with a capacity of at least 50Mbps. All WiMAX base stations shown are fully 802.16e compliant mobile WiMAX base stations with an aggregate capacity of at least 15Mbps per sector.

Customer traffic originates with subscriber devices such as outdoor (roof-mounted) CPE, indoor (desktop gateway) CPE, mobile Internet devices (MIDs), mobile phones, or WiMAX-embedded laptops. Traffic flows from these devices over the WiMAX air link to DBC-owned WiMAX base stations installed on rooftops or cellular towers in the community. From these base stations, traffic is routed over IP-based FastEthernet connections leased from DBC's middle mile fiber providers back to aggregation points in colocation facilities around the country. Traffic is routed, managed, controlled, and aggregated via DBC's ASN gateways over the Internet. DBC is able to manage all traffic and all devices on the network via its Network Operations Center (NOC) in Ashburn, Virginia.

The antenna height for each WiMAX base station is 150 feet above ground level. Each base station's broadcast radius varies based on the terrain, foliage, and building clutter of the proposed service area, but an average base station covers between 30 and 60 square miles.
